Honley Woods

Quarrying in the Woods

Honley Woods being quarried for stone

Honley Woods is one of West Yorkshire's largest remaining ancient semi-natural woodland areas. Covering 60 hectares (150 acres), it is an important example of upland oak woodland and is a key part of the local forest habitat network.

The landowner Johnson Wellfield Quarry Ltd, Kirklees Council, the Aggregates Levy Sustainability Fund and the Holme Valley North Area Committee have worked together to improve the access to this important part of our natural heritage. Some of the works have been carried out by BTCV conservation volunteers.

The woodlands' owners have welcomed the opportunity to increase public access to the woods. The quarrying undertaken in the recent past has made a real contribution to the local economy in the provision of stone and aggregates making this industry one of the last remaining strongholds of manufacturing in this area.

The Methodist Mission, Huddersfield town centre, made from local stone.

This guide gives information for a newly waymarked circular walk and how to find out more about the woodland and its features.

The woods, animals and plants

Honley Woods have the remains of many old features such as the quarries, coal pits and boundaries which were shown on the first Ordnance Survey maps of 150 years ago. But underneath the brambles and bracken there are archaeological features which the map surveyors failed to recognise – earthwork boundaries, small cairns, defensive earthworks and probable burial sites – all of which belong to later prehistory, the period extending from the Bronze Age (2000- 800 BC) to the Iron Age (800 BC – 100 AD).

The woods are home to a wide range of animals and plants.
